

David H. Webber is a leading expert on securities and investment law. His research on shareholder activism, corporate governance, and shareholder litigation has frequently been cited by courts and academics. Webber's work is increasingly focused on the intersection of politics and investment. Public pension and labor union funds, sovereign wealth funds, foundations, and socially responsible investors are increasingly utilizing their shareholder power to pursue ends not traditionally pursued by investors. As the size and power of such investors continues to grow in the 21st century, they will change the way markets and companies operate, challenging traditional legal constraints on investor behavior. Webber addresses some of these issues in his forthcoming book about shareholder activism, to be published by Harvard University Press.

History of Visiting Scholar in Residence Lecture

In 2010, the Delaware Law School's Institute of Delaware Corporate and Business Law set out to create a forum for scholarly interaction between the Delaware bench and bar and younger law professors establishing a solid reputation in corporate and business law. The forum would inform the Delaware bar of recent scholarship, while providing the professors with feedback from the Delaware bar on their research.

The Delaware Counsel Group LLP, a firm that focuses on corporate and alternative entity transactions, agreed to help the forum become a reality. Since that time, the forum has been held every year, with the support of the Ruby R. Vale Foundation and The Delaware Counsel Group LLP.

Each of the visiting scholars in the program to date has continued as a notable contributor to corporate law scholarship. They have included Robert Sitkoff, Steven Davidoff Solomon, Mohsen Manesh, Minor Myers, Afra Afsharipour and Verity Winship.
